

NEEF News— July 12, 2010

Environmental Education

Philadelphia Inquirer Here's a novel idea for making the world a greener place: Have everyone get up close and personal with 50 local species.

Portage Daily Register About 200 people gathered at Wisconsin's MacKenzie Environmental Education Center to learn about plants, fishing, trapping, shooting, archery and outdoor cooking at the annual outdoor skills event.

Green Jobs

Treehugger Treehugger looks at the 10 best U.S. cities for finding a green job.

Business Weekly Nevada general contractors who've been hard pressed to find work this summer have found a boon in a handful of photovoltaic installation projects for the Washoe County School District.

Climate Change

Politico As the climate debate intensifies, it looks increasingly like Plan C — which even President Barack Obama has characterized as a worst-case option — will prevail. As administrative rules on emissions control slide into place, look for the climate change battles to take plenty of dramatic twists and turns.

Industry Week Public companies face exposure to legal liability for investor losses blamed on failure to anticipate or disclose climate change risks.

Health and Environment

Wall Street Journal With urban runoff increasingly being blamed for dirtying the nation's waters, the search is on for solutions that involve filtering or soaking up rainwater where it falls.

Louisville Courier Journal Dozens of chemicals and pharmaceuticals -- antidepressants, veterinary hormones, even cocaine -- have been detected in the Ohio River upstream and downstream from Louisville.